Peek Inside the Book

They were men. They crept upon their hands and knees. They used their hands only, dragging their legs. They used their knees only, their arms hanging idle at their sides. They strove to rise to their feet, but fell prone in the attempt. They did nothing naturally, and nothing alike, save only to advance foot by foot in the same direction. Singly, in pairs and in little groups, they came on through the gloom, some halting now and again while others crept slowly past them, then resuming their movement. They...

Reader's Opinions

Devastating.

I've arranged my thoughts into a haiku: "Childish day dreams, Harsh, creeping reality Allows no quarter."
